All of which can lead to very well-written papers that no one reads. The university's culture of cut-throat competition, which one former professor described as the "kid on the block mentality," has produced some successful graduates. Now, I am looking for ways to test some legacy code without using hard coded values for tests. I am aware of creating Parameterized test cases, but the issue is I am not aware of how to set values for those parameters. One example is to take values like 10,20,30,40,50 from a configuration file, and then providing them as parameters of the test case. My legacy code is reading the values from configuration file and using them in code. I am trying to test my legacy code to validate if it reads the values from configuration file or 82157476af
